Course description

It is not uncommon for certain cardiovascular diseases and especially gastrointestinal diseases to have first clinical manifestations involving the oral cavity and teeth, sometimes up to 2 years before any other manifestations of the disease. The goal of our postgraduate course is to point out such diseases and to show to which degree certain cardiovascular and gastrointestinal diseases can be related to changes that can be observed in oral cavity. Furthermore, we'd like to emphasize and show certain lesion involving oral mucosa and teeth that can be related to standard therapy for some cardiovascular and gastrointestinal diseases. Our subject will also try to encompass contraindications and cautions when performing certain dental procedures in relation both to certain cardiovascular and gastrointestinal diseases and their therapy (i.e. anticoagulant therapy and tooth extraction).

We expect that the postgraduates, upon finishing our course, will be able to recognize certain cardiovascular and gastrointestinal diseases and will therefore know how to adequately direct their patient. Also, we expect that, given the insight into pathophysiology behind the said diseases and their oral manifestations, they'll receive a strong base for current and future scientific studies.

Learning outcomes

1. Knowledge

- Describe the leading symptoms and signs of diseases of internal organs and organ systems
- Link symptoms into specific clinical presentation and syndromes
- Present differential - diagnostic possibilities based on clinical symptoms and signs in patients

2. Skills

- Identify the leading symptoms of the disease and their association with specific clinical dental entities
- Diagnose the disease by judging the results of diagnostic tests
- Plan the optimal type and sequence of therapeutic procedures with prediction of disease prognosis, course, effects and treatment outcomes
